

Home delivery/ Take Out

Online delivery options can be a smart choice for getting the groceries and household supplies you need. Having your shopping delivered reduces your exposure, but doesn't eliminate it.

- It's a good idea to have the delivery person leave your packages and bags next to your door without interacting with you, if that's possible. Some of the delivery services allow for this — you can pay and tip with the app.
- If the delivery person comes into your house and puts items on your countertop, maintain a six-foot distance. If the delivery person is visibly coughing or sneezing, don't allow them into your home.
- Once your delivery is received, wipe down any contacted door knobs or handles on both sides with disinfecting wipes, antibacterial hand sanitizer or soap and water.
- Next wash your hands, then put your groceries away. "I don't think you have to wipe down every box," Boling says.
- Throw away the shopping bags — Boling doesn't recommend keeping them.
- Wash your hands again, and wipe down your countertops.

These services aren't free, though some offer free trials. You may be faced with an annual fee, delivery fee and/or service fee. You should tip your shopper/driver. And prices may be higher than what you would pay in store. But the peace of mind that comes from limiting your person-to-person interactions right now might make it worth the price.

With these services, you can also have items delivered to another location. So, if you are concerned about aging parents, relatives, or friends having what they need, you can place an order for them.

Deliveries can be a nice way to send fresh fruit, vegetables, and dairy to someone who is worried about leaving the house and mainly eating shelf-stable, packaged items.

Locally:

Walmart Grocery delivers in Wadsworth. Amazon Prime Now delivers groceries from Whole Foods to many locations, and Amazon Pantry delivers shelf-stable items.

Buehler's website notes: Experiencing long wait times: up to 1 week.
